SUMMARY

Synopsis of Bill

Senate Bill 334 would make an appropriation of $100,000 to the Department of Health (DOH) to fund a traditional healing training program in northern New Mexico for treating persons with substance abuse and related disorders. Any unexpected or unencumbered balance remaining at the end of the fiscal year 2008 would revert back to the General Fund.

FISCAL IMPLICATIONS

DOH notes that the appropriation of $100,000 to DOH is not included in the executive budget request for the Department of Health. Also, a training program for traditional healers does not currently exist. Developing and administering such a program is costly and DOH would likely need to work with Na’Nizhoozhi Center for them to do the training. Because of the limited appropriation and the fact that this would be developing a new program, DOH would start with funding training for Navajo traditional healing

SIGNIFICANT ISSUES

DOH notes that several recognized traditional healing approaches from various ethnicities exist in New Mexico, which includes Native American traditional healers, Hispanic curanderos, the Sikh communities, and other groups. Many Native American traditional healing practices have been shown to be effective means of addressing substance abuse and related disorders in New Mexico, utilizing interventions such as talking circles, tribal/sheriff/Governor/marriage sponsors, sweat lodge peacemakers, prayer meetings, family group conferencing, and traditional healing ceremonies (Five Sandoval Indian Pueblos, Inc. Behavioral Health Centers ATR presentation, Mr. Gus Abeita, 2006).

The federally funded Access to Recovery (ATR) grant currently managed by the Behavioral Health Services Division (BHSD), funds traditional healing through substance abuse recovery support services and has shown positive outcomes with this approach. The Navajo Nation established the Na'Nizhoozhi Center, Inc. in Gallup in 1992. This program has also demonstrated positive outcomes in addressing the substance abuse needs of individuals seeking substance abuse treatment with the integrated use of traditional healing techniques.

Senate Bill 334 would make available to DOH funds to create a traditional healing training program in northern New Mexico for treating person with substance abuse and related disorders. Senate Bill 334 does not indicate the type of traditional healing approaches that are included in the training or background requirements, including education and/or experience, of potential trainees for participation in the program.

ADMINISTRATIVE IMPLICATIONS

There would need to be collaboration with the Higher Education Department and/or the Consortium for Behavioral Health Training and Research (CBHTR) to coordinate the development of this training program. Additional funding may be needed for DOH staff for these responsibilities. In addition, there would be some costs in administering this program.

DUPLICATION

SB 334 is duplicated by HB 715.

TECHNICAL ISSUES

Senate Bill 334 needs some clarification regarding which types of traditional healing are to be included in order to guide the development of the program. Senate Bill 334 does not indicate whether the intention is to use the funds to develop the program and pay for trainers and whether the training should be free to the trainees or not.
